Limitations to searching via name within these microfilm records include spelling and numerical errors, lost, missing or misfiled cards and corruption of the data by poor quality filming. The nominal index cards would not always distinguish one same named person to another.

These records should be used as a supplemental tool in searching for historical ownership. You should not assume a person does not own property (or a property) based purely on a nominal index record not being found. Other information (where and when) needed to support the request should be provided if it is available.

Full names, including and middle names are essential requirements to a successful outcome

These microfilm and microfiche records are captured from hundreds of thousands of cards previously held. The originals of which are now destroyed.
